

as a desirable dessert fruit, its flavor being subacid, and lacking in richness. The fruits are very large, often weighing two pounds, and ripen late in the season. For culinary use they are excellent, yielding delicious sauces, if stewed before fully ripe. Shipments to northern markets in past years have brought excellent returns, the fruits being marketable in October, when there are no other mangos available.